Yes, it is a Christian duty, to secure a pleasant home, when the days are dark and rainy. Yes, to feel one's self protected from the blasts that winter winds, and the step of frost, and the cold of the winter. To all parents and their friends, MORTAL: Yes, build thyself a nice new house, exempt from ice, fog, or snow.

HE HAS HIT ME.
One bright evening two men were seen walking on the outskirts of Paris. One carried a pickaxe and the other a gun. A large spaniel followed, apparently weary with the day's duties. As they walked gently along, the men conversed calmly.
"I tell you, Jeanette, will marry Pierre," said the one bearing the pickaxe.
"And I bet you she will marry Pierre," replied the other.
"Why, it was but yesterday that she danced four times with Claude."
"While to-day she gathered the choicest flowers for Pierre."
"You are very obstinate, Andre."
"Not more than you, Father Simon," responded the young man. "Of one thing, however, I am very certain. The girl will never marry Jean."
"There I think you are right. The lad is not handsome, and inclined to be well," responded old Simon, sadly.
"Well, she must soon decide," continued Andre. "She is now nearly eighteen, economical, careful and pretty; a treasure for any man."
"That is so, and I wish I was a younger man, that I might win the list of her admirers, who knows but I would have a chance?"
They were at this instant interrupted by a pure and lovely voice singing a gay song, and, looking up, the two men saw the subject of their conversation busy gathering a bunch of wild flowers.
"Why, Jeanette, when one speaks of the angels their song is heard," exclaimed the old man.
"Were you speaking of me, Father Simon?" she inquired, artlessly.
"Who else could occupy my thoughts?" "Come, tell me what you were saying," continued the girl, as she called the last lady in her path.
"Well, we were entertaining a point, namely, the question of who you will marry. One of us says it will be Pierre."
"Yes?" And the other?
"That your choice will fall upon Claude."
"Which of us is right, Jeanette?" inquired Andre.
"Who knows?" she replied, with a merry laugh, as placing the flowers in her second verse, she ran on before, singing the second verse of the song their coming had interrupted.
"Did you see how she smiled when you mentioned Pierre?" inquired Father Simon.
"Notwithstanding, I will adhere to the belief that she will marry Claude. Shall we bet?" said Andre.
"As you will. Suppose we say a good dinner?"
And so it was arranged, as they shook hands and turned towards the village. Jeanette, the subject of their dispute, was an orphan; her mother had died in giving her birth, and her father had sacrificed his life in the effort to save some friends from the flames of a burning village.
"Should I die," he said to these young fellows, "I would leave my property to you, and I would not only in saving his friends, but in arresting the flames; he, however, left a victim. The families saved from ruin accepted the legacy. The curate, Jeanette, the little girl, and it was agreed that she should pass one month of each year with twelve of the families who were best able to attend to her education. This she had reached her fifteenth year, it was determined that a dot or marriage portion should be given her. The poor could contribute only eggs, chickens, and other matters, while those on whom fortune had smiled gave liberally.
Jeanette talked and laughed with Claude and Pierre, but no one could discover that she evinced any preference.
It might have been a matter of some surprise that she had three decided admirers, had the reason not been easily explained.
One night, two years before the story opened, Jeanette was suddenly seized with illness; the physician was many miles off, and the night so fearfully stormy and dark that it was almost impossible to leave the house. Regardless of all risks, Jean started at once, but had gone but a short distance when his usual ill-luck befell him; his horse stumbled and threw him, thus dislocating his ankle. Pierre then set out, and Claude attended the sick girl.
Early in the morning Jeanette revived, and was pronounced out of danger. Poor Jean, notwithstanding his own intolerable suffering, had remained at the foot of her bed during the entire night. On learning that the danger was passed, he fainted, and the following day Jeanette vowed to marry one of the three who had evinced such friendship for her.
Some days after a ball was given to celebrate her recovery. She looked the very picture of happiness and beauty, and was, of course, attended by her three lovers.
Towards the close of the entertainment, the trio, by appointment, met in a secluded spot, having determined to come to some determination regarding their hopes of becoming the husband of Jeanette.
"This must end," said Pierre, "for we all love the girl."
"True," responded Claude. Jean was silent and sad.
"Have you nothing to say?" inquired Pierre.
"Yes," replied Jean; "I have a proposition to make."
"What is it?"
"Jeanette, you know, can marry but one of us."
"No one will be fool enough to dispute that fact," said Claude.
"There are two too many in the field; let us fight, and whoever is victorious shall claim her as fairly his."
"I have something else to suggest," said Pierre. "Let us play for her, and the game decide her choice. Are you both willing?"
"The result will be the same to me, no matter what we do," replied Jean; "no matter what course is taken, I must lose. I, however, prefer a fight, because I have the chance of being killed, which is preferable to life without the woman I love."
"Well, let us draw," said Pierre, decided.
A cent was thrown into the air, and a decision made that they should fight.
The following day the three rivals met in the cemetery, the place appointed for the combat. The proper preliminaries were observed, and the battle was about to commence in good earnest, when Jeanette suddenly appeared. Her cheeks were pale and stained with tears. "I know all," she said, "and there must be an end of this strife."

"And so there will be, if you will let us alone for about an hour," exclaimed Pierre, provoked at the interruption.
"Hold your tongue. When I choose to have the matter end it will do so, and not until then," responded Jeanette. "How could you give me so much trouble? So you were going to fight, and perhaps kill each other, in order to gain my favor? Foolish fellows, not to remember that had one of you been spared, he would have been hateful to me, owing to the loss of the others."
"I did not think of that," said Pierre. "Woman-like, I would have dearly loved the dead or wounded," continued Jeanette, and your trouble, if victorious, would have been for nothing but a frown. Jean sighed, and regretted silently not to be either dead or wounded.
"The matter can be amicably settled," added the young girl; but first I must receive your promise to do just as I bid you."
A unanimous promise was instantly given, and Jeanette resumed:
"I love you all now as though you were my brothers; but the day in all probability will come, when I will choose one of you for my husband. In order to decide the question, you must each leave the village and remain away three years. On your return, you will tell me in what manner you occupied your time during your absence. He who loves me best, and merits me the most, I will accept, and marry. Now let us shake hands and part."
And so it was arranged. The understanding being concluded, the three faithful subjects conducted their queen to her cottage, and there bade her farewell.
It was a bright summer morning when the friends set out on the journey, joyfully pledged.
The curate, who had known them from their birth, celebrated mass for the benefit of their souls; and the whole village bade them God-speed.
After the departure of the three young men, Jeanette lived as she had always done, rising with the sun, singing with the birds, gathering the sweetest flowers, and doing good to all particularly the poor, and tending faithfully to add to her little store. At times the shadow of a faint cloud would gather upon her fresh young face, and she seemed absorbed by some secret thought.
"She is thinking of Pierre," murmured old Father Simon, her neighbor; but sometimes Andre contested the point, deeming Claude the subject of her thoughts. No one mentioned her Jean, or if they did, it was to quote his usual blunder and want of success.
Jeanette danced less and prayed more frequently. Her friends found her in church kneeling before the image of the Virgin, and the altar sacred to the Blessed Mother. No one mentioned her Jean, or if they did, it was to quote his usual blunder and want of success.
